Not so, say the authors. The average number of hours American women spend on market work per year remains less than full-time because some women do no market work and others work part-time or take time off to meet their children's needs. Women's market work histories are far more episodic than men's.

Changing Rhythms of American Family Life (review)

THE CULTURAL image of the American mother has changed from the cheery, doting homemaker to the frenzied, sleepless working mom. The conventional wisdom accompanying this change is that as today's mothers juggle the dual roles of worker and family caregiver, they must spend less time with their children, and receive little help from fathers.
